

Throughout our history as a nation, there have been numerous sentiments about numerous issues. These sentiments have led to many protests, some of which were monumental and course-altering for our country. This being said, there are some issues that, numerically and statistically, are just as breathtaking and disappointing as others that are not as media-covered or protested. For me, this begs the question “What determines what is protested?” In my essay, I will seek to explore this question.
